A large portion of the audience left when he begun to speak, and this marked discourtesy had a visible effect on his spirits, causing him to show irritation. He appealed frequently to the reason and unprejudiced judgment of his hearers, frequently reported in the daily papers. He appealed to the old line Whigs whom he said could not consistently follow the doctrines taught by Calhoun. He criticised Gov. Bate for devoting so much time to National politics, which he said should be left to the electors. He denied being ashamed of having served as a Confederate soldier, but confessed that he was glad that the Union was preserved. In regard to the State debt, he denounced the 50-3 act as a crime and a disgrace. Said he didn't believe the debt was settled, but that as Governor he would veto any act tending to reopen the matter.
